

January 24, 1963

MIAMI ACCOLADE FOR FORMER BATISTA HATCHETMEN

Kennedy's heroes: A lotBy Carleton Beals
Special to the Guardian

AT THE ORANGE BOWL in Miami Dec. 29, President Kennedy and his wife Jacqueline spoke to the released invaders of Cuba seized at the Bay of Pigs (Playa Giron) April 17, 1961. From José Alfredo Pérez San Roman, commander of invading Brigade 2506, the President received the flag of that unit, allegedly smuggled out of Cuba after the defeat, and Kennedy promised that the flag would be returned to the invaders "in a free Havana."

The President, in his oath of office, had pledged himself to uphold the laws of the United States, which include all foreign treaties. But in this Miami ceremony, he honored as heroes the motley group which, at his behest, had violated U.S. neutrality laws as well as Cuban sovereignty.

Who are these men Kennedy called "the bravest in the world?" The stories and backgrounds of their leaders can be pieced together from statements they themselves made in Cuba after their capture, from testimony at trials, from interviews on TV and from letters.

FOR EXAMPLE: Take San Roman, the commander who handed his brigade's banner to Kennedy. For ten years he was an officer in the Batista army. After the revolution he got a job with INRA, the

It was first necessary to make mothers, wives, sisters and sweethearts of the hundreds of other Cubans who fell before our fire, put on mourning; that had been necessary for this whole spectacle of horror, blood, tears, useless sacrifices and irreparable injuries to fall upon my shoulders . . .

"I have sunk so deep into the abyss that no human force can ever get me out."

President Kennedy did his best, said in the Miami Orange Bowl. San Roman was enlightened, and ready for a new blood crusade of "idiots."

A DIFFERENT SONG: Manuel Artime Buena, civil affairs co-chief for the invasion forces, was one of the spokesmen for the released prisoners. A few days before the Miami Bowl reunion, he told a meeting of 4,000 Cuban exiles, "Today we want no tears. We call everybody to war."

Artime had spoken differently in a press conference in Havana in May, 1961 after his capture at Playa Giron. He spoke bitterly about the U.S. government, whose officials "had planned, trained, subsidized and directed" the invasion. "What was done with the invasion was a real crime," he said. "They played with the lives of 1,400 men. I am ready to tell the world before the UN all about the U.S. participation in this invasion."

Artime has told how, in Cuba after the revolution, he was accused of stealing funds intended for peasants, and was helped by a U.S. secret agent to escape to Florida. He said he was in Miami

The following is an excerpt from an editorial in the Jan. 1 San Francisco Chronicle as it appeared in I.F. Stone's

Sec 6 Cuba
X Pers 2 - 1
X Pers 3 R. SAN ROMAN
X Pers 3 J. SAN ROMAN
X Pers 3 M. ARTIME
X pg 2